

Caucus of Corruption author bios Matt Margolis and Mark Noonan

Matt Margolis

Matt Margolis, 27, lives in the blue state of Massachusetts. He attended the University of Hartford to study architecture, graduating summa cum laude and with University Honors in 2002.

In November 2003, Matt founded Blogs For Bush, which quickly became one of the top blogs during the 2004 campaign. Matt was one of the first bloggers to receive credentials to cover the Republican National Convention in New York City.

Matt runs a number of other blogs, including GOP Bloggers and Hub Politics, a blog devoted to Massachusetts politics. Matt has been an invited guest on CNN and other television and radio programs.

Matt is currently pursuing a master's degree in architecture and works full-time as an architectural designer. He lives near Boston, Massachusetts.

Mark Noonan

Mark Noonan, originally from Ramapo, New York, and has lived on both sides of the country, spending his early years in New Jersey and the majority of his youth in San Diego, California. After graduating from high school he spent four years in the U.S. Navy, serving extensively in Europe and the Middle East.

After 9/11, Noonan felt compelled to make a difference, sought out venues to express his views, and found himself commenting on Internet message boards and blogs.

After being introduced to Matt Margolis in fall 2003, Mark joined Blogs For Bush as a regular contributor motivated by patriotism and a desire to help reelect President Bush in 2004. Mark's writing contributed to the blog becoming one of the most popular during the presidential campaign. Mark also blogs at GOP Bloggers and recently started his own blog devoted to politics in Nevada, Battle Born Politics.

Mark has been an invited guest on MSNBC and other television and radio programs. Mark lives in North Las Vegas, Nevada, with his wife.
